CAREGIVING FOR A LOVED ONE WITH A LONG-TERM ILLNESS

Today, people are managing a cancer diagnosis better than ever before, and many are able to manage their treatment over the long term or are even experiencing remissions. For caregivers or individuals caring for a loved one with long-term illness, this can prolong their caregiving role. Here are some helpful hints for caregiving for a loved one with a long-term illness.

LONG-TERM CAREGIVING

When you are caring for a loved one with a long-term illness, caregiving becomes a marathon rather than a sprint. A caregiver's involvement and role may change depending on their loved one's health.

As a caregiver, it is important to know and accept your own limits. Stress develops whenever you start to feel that your responsibilities are greater than the time, energy, or other resources that you have to meet them. Stress is common among caregivers of people coping with cancer who face so many competing demands. This can be especially challenging when your role as a caregiver may change over time, sometimes unexpectedly, depending on your loved one's health. Finding ways to manage stress can help you feel better, protect your health, and make you better equipped to care for your loved one.

Reflect on strengths you and your loved one have developed. Many families who face the challenges of cancer discover courage they didn't know they had. For example, you may recall how brave your loved one was while receiving chemotherapy or how successful you were in advocating for their needs. Acknowledge the strengths you and your loved one have developed, and build on them whether your loved one is going through treatment or has a temporary break from treatment.

Adjust expectations, especially during holidays. A long-term illness may mean your loved one is in remission one year but undergoing treatment the next year. Consider if an upcoming event may place too much of a burden on you or your loved one. Think about how you've helped each other feel better during a difficult time in the past and how you can adjust going forward.
Find someone to open up to. Don’t keep your emotions bottled up. Sharing your feelings with someone you trust—a partner, sibling, other family member, friend, spiritual leader, or social worker—can make your concerns seem more manageable. Caregiver support groups are also available. These can give you an opportunity to meet and learn from others in similar situations. CancerCare’s professional oncology social workers provide free counseling and support groups (including online and telephone support groups for caregivers) to you and your loved one to help you cope with your role as a caregiver.

Recognize that you are doing your best. There is no “right” way to be a caregiver. It’s important to give yourself permission to acknowledge your efforts as a caregiver and to be patient with yourself as you navigate this role.

CancerCare® Can Help
Founded in 1944, CancerCare is the leading national organization providing free support services and information to help people manage the emotional, practical and financial challenges of cancer. Our comprehensive services include counseling and support groups over the phone, online and in-person, educational workshops, publications and financial and co-payment assistance. All CancerCare services are provided by professional oncology social workers and world-leading cancer experts.

To learn more, visit www.cancercare.org or call 800-813-HOPE (4673).
Facebook: facebook.com/cancercare
Twitter: @cancercare

Edited by Carly O’Brien, LCSW, OSW-C