EYE AND VISION CONCERNS: RESOURCES AND SUPPORT

Vision changes can be a treatment side effect for some individuals. Symptoms may include irritated or dry eyes, tearing, redness, pain and blurred vision. Talking to your health care team about treatment side effects can help you find the information and support you need.

EYE OR VISION CONCERNS

There is no such thing as over-communication and your health care team will want to know about any changes you may experience throughout treatment. You may also want to have an ophthalmologist (an eye doctor) check your eyes to rule out any concerns unrelated to cancer. Some people have other health conditions and take medications that may affect vision, and it's important to rule out any other factors that might be contributing to changes in your vision.

FIND SUPPORT

Seek individual counseling with a professional. You may feel that the challenges of a cancer diagnosis are yours alone to cope with, and perhaps feel the need to withdraw from others. Oncology social workers counsel people affected by cancer and can help you sort through complex emotions and practical issues. CancerCare provides free individual counseling to people with cancer and caregivers across the country.

Consider joining a support group. Support groups are a safe environment where members can relate to each other through a shared, similar experience. Joining a support group can provide valuable information. Members find that sharing resources and coping skills can be highly rewarding, whether they are on the giving or the receiving end of support. CancerCare provides free, professionally led support groups throughout the United States over the telephone and online. CancerCare also offers face-to-face support groups that are offered in New York City, Long Island and New Jersey.
